Whether the forger's success made him careless or whether it was due to one of those remarkable oversights to which the most skillful criminals seem liable and which bring their career to a close, the forger was at last exposed through a mistake of which such a clever man should scarcely have been capable.

Among the many forgeries he pro duced a poem signed by Robert Burns. It was called "The Poor Man's Prayer" and opened with this stanza: Amidst the more important toils of state, The counsels laboring in the patriotic

And thy keen glance extend from pole

This poem, which consisted of nineteen verses, might well have escaped detection with the rest but for the fact that a gentleman to whom the poem was shown discovered the identical verses in the London Magazine of 1766 in a poem addressed to the Earl of Chatham by one Simon Hodge,

Thus it appeared that if the verses poet must have opened them under the pseudonym of Simon Hodge at the very immature age of a poet of seven years. Suspicion once aroused, doubt was at once cast on the hundreds of other documents which had emanated from the same source. The Lenox collection was submitted to the experts "a worthless lot of forgeries," and collectors all the world over awoke to the the paper they were written on. The forger's career was brought to a sudden termination. He was brought up for trial and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, thus closing a career of forgery which for daring, eleverness and success has perhaps never been equaled .- New York Press.
